J. Kirk McGill is a Denver attorney with Hall Estill who specializes in litigation and regulatory matters around the state of Colorado.

“Any time an injury has two or more independent causes, the complexity of the legal issues increases substantially," McGill said in a statement. "Here, the investigation found that the Twelve Tribes acted reasonably to cover up a fire on their property by converting it with dirt, and that they could not have predicted that the wind would blow the dirt off the fire six days later. Thus, Twelve Tribes will likely argue that they have no liability because they acted reasonably in covering the earlier fire with dirt.” READ MORE HERE
