The U.S. Supreme Court recently overturned the longstanding Chevron doctrine, a foundation of administrative law for 40 years, when it ruled on Loper Bright Enterprises v. Raimondo. The impacts on a wide range of industries subject to federal regulations will be significant.

Some are already being felt; others are harder to predict. Some will likely be positive for the energy sector, but there are significant business risks to consider. As the post-Chevron "new normal" takes shape, it is critical for regulated entities to stay focused on regulatory compliance, and to ensure they remain active and engaged with legislators and policymakers.
