Because artificial intelligence radically reduces the amount of time it takes to sift through data and create relationships between data, it is no longer necessary for nefarious actors to hack personally identifiable information from websites like Ashley Madison, which offered discrete affairs and was hacked in 2015, in order to obtain or infer sensitive details about a person's life.

In the age of AI, the recent hack involving AT&T Inc. and nearly all of its customers' call logs is likely to contain sufficient information from which inferences of affairs or other sensitive information could be made.

This is why regulators — in states and at the federal level — must completely rethink their approach to cybersecurity reporting requirements. READ MORE
